Editorial policy: Macrolinguistics aims at informing scholars of the Indo-European languages of the linguistic research of scholars of non-Indo-European languages, providing impetus for scholars of the Indo-European languages to develop new theories and contributing to the complementarity and interaction of linguistic research worldwide. The Journal mainly publishes papers in the following areas: (1) original and pioneering theoretical research by scholars of non-Indo-European languages in linguistics and applied linguistics; (2) studies, descriptions and analyses of the rich resources of non-Indo-European languages (both living language materials and time-honored old language materials); (3) summary and assessment of the linguistic interpretations from massive research into the traditional philological studies of the non-Indo-European languages that can be introduced into the study of other languages, as well as the theoretical advancement on this basis; (4) trends in the linguistic study of non-Indo-European languages. The first issue of this Journal is devoted to the introduction to the scholars of Indo-European languages linguistic research conducted by Chinese scholars. In the subsequent issues, we will include the studies by scholars of non-Indo-European languages from other countries. This Journal will be published in English. Papers submitted in other languages will be translated into English.
